Adapting to a Rapidly Changing World

CONFLICT PREVENTION, mediation and conflict resolution are the cornerstones of the work of the Department of Political Affairs (DPA). Today, the need to adapt to deal with a rapidly changing conflict landscape is clear. Violent conflict has increased after decades of relative decline. Direct deaths in war, displaced populations, military spending, and terrorist incidents have all surged in the past twenty years, as detailed in the recent UN-World Bank “Pathways to Peace” report. Many of the risks we face today – including climate change, violent extremism, organized crime – transcend national borders and make each conflict we deal with more complex and more protracted. Meanwhile, conflict prevention and peacebuilding have remained fragmented and under-funded, while enormous human and material capital is spent on crisis management.

To address these changes, the peace and security pillar of the United Nations, along with other important parts of the Organization, is undergoing a transformation. We are changing to become more nimble, coordinated and, thus, effective in helping countries eliminate extreme poverty, prevent armed conflict and overcome other persistent ills. The adjustments will be large and small. For one, starting in 2019, DPA will be renamed the Department of Political and Peacebuilding Affairs. But the change will be more than cosmetic. We are pooling resources and capacity for analysis and action with our peacekeeping and peacebuilding colleagues to ensure that the UN can anticipate and face threats to peace earlier and with more coherence, as well as design smoother transitions away from conflict.

Success in our work depends not only on us but on the support of different parties, including those we are trying to help. I applaud the dedication and commitment shown by my colleagues around the world. And I have seen the active cooperation of parties trying to move beyond conflict. In the pages of this year-end edition of Politically Speaking, you will see some of the results of DPA’s work to prevent conflict, mediate disputes and provide electoral support, among other efforts. Come 1 January 2019, our name will change. Our commitment to helping societies avert war and build peace will not.

Decolonization

More than 80 former colonies have attained independence since the creation of the United Nations. But the process of decolonization is not complete. Presently, 17 territories home to nearly 2 million people in Africa, Europe, the Atlantic, the Caribbean and the Pacific remain on the UN list of Non-Self-Governing Territories (NSGTs). In March 2018, the Special Committee on Decolonization, supported by DPA's Decolonization Unit, conducted a visit to New Caledonia to support "the Territory in its preparations for the referendum on self-determination". The referendum was held successfully on 4 November 2018. DPA's Electoral Assistance provided support to the organization of the referendum.
